

First Paper Assignment

DUE TUESDAY, OCTOBER 24, AT 10 PM ON CANVAS

Write a focused, analytic paper making an argument about a specific problem, device, or pattern in Portrait of the Artist, Mrs. Dalloway, or As I Lay Dying. Demonstrate your claims by analyzing specific textual evidence. Your paper should be 1800–2400 words in length; longer papers are usually acceptable, but significantly shorter papers cannot earn a satisfactory grade.

SUGGESTED TOPICS

You may formulate your own highly focused topic or adapt one of the following:

Make an impression. Develop an interpretation of the significance of sensory detail in Joyce, Woolf, or Faulkner; choose specific passages of description, or specific linguistic devices for registering perception, for your analysis. What comes to unexpected prominence, and what is pushed into the background? In what ways do the senses matter—as conduits for beauty, for knowledge, for judgment? You need not focus exclusively on sight (there are other kinds of perception). Distinguish rigorously between perceiving and knowing. Do not limit yourself to pointing out “bias” in a character’s point of view.

Madness and the metaphysical plane. In Joyce, Woolf, and Faulkner, certain characters experience a melding of the physical and the metaphysical worlds (the spiritual, the dream-world, the beyond). Often this melding appears to be linked to madness or the appearance of madness. Develop an argument about the significance of these experiences of the metaphysical in one of your chosen texts: How does blending the ordinary and the extraordinary—or confusing the distinction between them—work to complicate a central theme or problem? Successful papers will avoid reifying or diagnosing sanity or insanity by focusing on a specific pattern, setting, character, or episode and its possible meanings.

Minor role. Develop an interpretive argument about a character in Joyce, Woolf, or Faulkner who occupies only a small narrative space. What role does this character play in the structure and meaning of the text? How does this character work to point out particular themes? Why is the character represented only briefly, and what are the implications of this brevity for what is and is not represented? It may be particularly fruitful to think about the way fictional minoriness may be connected to forms of social marginalization.

Narrative and memory. Consider the narrative significance of memory. When and how does memory enter the text: how is it narrated, and what is its narrative function? Why are events not simply narrated in order? Do not confine your claims to “character development” or to a list of examples; identify a particular kind of memory and interpret its functions.

No biggie. Woolf writes, “Let us not take it for granted that life exists more fully in what is commonly thought big than in what is commonly thought small.” Use this idea to illuminate the way one of our writers handles trivial details and unimportant happenings, particularly in contrast to their handling of more obviously weighty matters. To what extent does the novel privilege the small scale over the big deal—and why? Develop an argument around a few chosen moments of triviality, explaining both why they are trivial and why they are especially revealing.

Same-gender relations. Choosing one of our texts, develop an argument about that text’s representation of same-gender characters’ relationships and desires. Remember that desires cannot always be clearly categorized as sexual or not. If there is more than one homosocial relation of interest, use a comparison among pairings to sharpen your claims about the novel’s representation of such relationships. Pay special attention to the distinction between what is explicit and what is suggested, what is socially legitimate and what is illicit—and how you know. Bad papers on this topic are characterized by generalizations, complacent assumptions that the past was repressed and we are now free, or “outing” gestures (“X is actually gay”): instead, develop your subtlest detailed analysis of particular cases.

Composition of place. Develop an argument about the meaning of particular kinds of setting in Portrait, Mrs. Dalloway, or As I Lay Dying, explaining the significance of environments or of movement through space for the novel. To be effective, an interpretation of setting has to show that setting itself matters to the themes: it is not enough to say that certain plot events happen somewhere. You might focus on city streets, for example; or on spaces of privacy and confinement; or on the way the novel compares locations; or on the difference between lived-in spaces and imagined ones.

Not all in the family. Most of Faulkner’s novel is narrated by the Bundrens, but not all. What is the cumulative effect of those moments when the narrator is a non-Bundren? A good argument must sample over the whole of the novel, but a short paper cannot cover all the possible examples. Think carefully about the contrasts among (say) Cora, Whitfield, and MacGowan, and develop an interpretation that makes sense of how the shift to a point of view outside the family works. What do these shifts let us see—about the Bundrens, about the society they inhabit, about the world Faulkner creates—that we could not otherwise see? Consider carefully about when the outsiders take over; think about how their biases are similar to or different from the main characters'; compare repeated narrators (e.g., Tull) with the one-offs (Samson).

Beasts of the field. The Bundrens are a farming family, and the novel pays a great deal of attention to the farm animals around them—horses, cows, mules—and to other fauna as well (vultures, fish). Develop an argument about the representation of non-human animals in the novel. For example: what do interactions between humans and animals reveal? Most conspicuous of all is Jewel and his horse, but this case is best placed in comparison to others. Or, bearing in mind that people are in fact animals: how does the novel compare people to animals, and with what effect? Consider the importance of figurative language as well as literal representation; consider animal and human labor; being owned and being free; animal bodies as against human bodies.

Ha ha, only serious. As I Lay Dying is a funny novel. How does Faulkner's humor transform the novel's treatment of its serious themes: death, grief, poverty, family conflict? Develop an argument that identifies one or more specific kinds of humor in the novel, paying close attention to the workings of language. Consider both laughing with and laughing at, mockery of outsiders as well as shared delight. How does humor reveal the ridiculousness of people who deserve to be brought low, and how (more disturbingly) does Faulkner get us to laugh at people who are already abject? A successful paper will carefully explain all the jokes it discusses.

WRITING GUIDELINES

Careful analysis of textual evidence is central to this paper. We have been modeling this mode of analysis in class. Your claims should be supported by extensive quotation. To support a claim, it is not enough simply to quote; once you quote, you must analyze what you have quoted, paying close attention to the significance of individual words, of syntactical and rhetorical patterns, of nuances and implications. Instead of attempting to paraphrase what a text means or summarize what it's about, show how it works. Do not take for granted that your reader will see the text the way you do: point out the details that can convince the reader of what you say. Every analytical claim you make should be supported by concrete evidence from the text; every part of your paper should make substantive analytical claims.

You are particularly encouraged to look back over your own commonplace-book entries, as well as your classmates', to search for evidence of the patterns, recurring themes, or insistent problems that you might write about.

Your paper must address a significant, interesting, non-obvious interpretive question about one of the texts, and it must propose a clearly articulated, non-simplistic answer to that question. The suggested topics give some hints about interesting questions. Successful papers always have a strong, focused motive for the particular analysis they carry out. Think about how your highly specific claims connect to broader questions about the author, genre, or theme your paper discusses, and how following your interpretation changes how readers should think about these questions. In order to find a motive in this sort of single-text assignment, think about what is most surprising about what you have to say. You may take for granted that your reader has in mind what has been discussed in class. (That also means that you should not repeat material from class too much.)

Motive is often established at the start of an essay. Avoid writing a generalizing introduction. Begin your essay with a surprising piece of evidence or observation of your own that immediately frames the topic you are going to address and establishes its interest. Then move from motive to argument: expanding on that initial piece of evidence, forecast the terms of your argument, then state the central, argumentative claim of the essay.

Your argument should answer your motivating question. That does not mean that every good paper resolves every problem it poses; on the contrary, good papers attend to the complexities of their subject matter. But an effective argument means your reader learns something from your analysis of your evidence. It will help to ask yourself what alternative arguments someone might make about your topic and to anticipate objections to your claims.

Think carefully about the line of thought of your writing, the way one claim leads to the next. “Transition sentences” are less important than your sense of the overall logic of your argument: think of the essay as a story you have to tell about the text you are analyzing, one with an arc from beginning to end. One of the most compelling ways to tell such a story is by thinking carefully about the order of presentation of evidence: indeed, you can “outline” a paper by first choosing the five or six passages that are most essential to your thinking and then deciding what sequence they should be presented in. The best sequence is rarely the sequence of the text itself; don’t start at the beginning and end at the end of your text. Choose an order that makes your point.

DRAFTS

Plan to draft and revise. You may send either of us partial or full drafts for brief comments, as long as you do so at least three days before the deadline. I will answer questions, time permitting, up through the day before the deadline.

FORMAT

Your paper should have 1.5-inch left and right margins, with text in twelve-point serif font (e.g.: Garamond, Hoefler Text, Palatino, Baskerville, or, less appealingly, Cambria, Times), and between single and one-and-a-half spacing. Number all pages. The paper should have your name and the date on the first page. Give your paper a meaningful title.

Submit your paper electronically via the Canvas Assignments tool. E-mail submissions are not acceptable. If you wish to turn in your paper in hard copy, please contact me in advance.

Digital submissions should be in Portable Document Format (PDF) if possible. Native word-processor formats (.doc, .docx, .pages, .odt) are acceptable. All word processors can produce PDF files, through a “Save As...” option, an “Export” command, or a “Print to PDF” option in the print dialog.

STYLE

Quotations should be carefully transcribed, punctuated, and attributed. In a paper on a single text, you may give a full citation only once, either in an MLA-style “Work Cited” bibliography or in a Chicago-style footnote to the first quotation. After that, citations can consist of page numbers in parentheses. Secondary sources are not required in this paper; but if you use someone else’s work, including someone’s informal comments inside class or out, you must cite that work. Using someone else’s work without specific citation is plagiarism. Consistency and thoroughness in citation is more important than exact fidelity to either MLA or Chicago style.

Please follow the conventions of standard written American English. I am non-prescriptive about things like the split infinitive, the sentence-final preposition, and “they” used as a gender-neutral singular pronoun. The passive voice is an excellent grammatical resource and can be used freely, provided it is used wisely.

The best resource on matters of usage is the Merriam-Webster Dictionary of English Usage. For detailed information about current and past word uses, the fundamental source is the Oxford English Dictionary.

LATE POLICY

Late papers will be graded. If I receive your late paper less than 48 hours after the deadline, your maximum grade is 3.0. A paper that is more than 48 hours late can receive no higher than a 2.0. You may turn in a late paper any time until the last class meeting.

Computer problems are not a valid excuse for lateness. Plan ahead. Back up frequently.

GRADING

The syllabus explains the general meaning of marks on the four-point scale. The chief criteria of assessment are:

Evidence. Has textual evidence been used extensively, chosen well, and interpreted effectively in support of claims?

Motive. Does the paper make its central problem interesting?

Argument. Is the argument focused, logical, convincing, surprising?

Line of thought. Does the paper develop its ideas in connected, orderly fashion? Does the conclusion follow from (and differ from) the opening?

Style. Is the paper clearly written? Is it free from typographical, grammatical, and other errors?

IN GENERAL

An A-range (3.5–4.0) paper is strong by all these criteria; a B-range (2.5–3.5) paper has well-chosen, well-analyzed evidence but does not fully develop its argument or its motive; a C-range (1.5–2.5) paper lacks evidence or uses evidence only to summarize plot; and a D-range (0.5–1.5) paper is too short or ignores the assignment.

If you submit work that is not your own, you will not receive credit for the assignment, and you will face disciplinary consequences. Any part of your paper that is not by you must be correctly attributed to its source; misrepresenting work written by someone else or generated with an online aid (including “AI”) as your own is plagiarism.
